Food products are often formed by complex micro and macro structures composed of ingredients from different classes of materials. Their ability to self-organize or change forms during processing can affect desirable sensorial attributes (e.g. texture, color, etc). This presentation will provide some examples on how the understanding of the structure of a food ingredient can help either the development of new ingredients or food products.